Weekly Report Internship – CLANET Damien (2)

This week, I continued my search for a four-to-six-month internship starting in February 2027. As in the previous week, I kept looking for potential contacts within my personal network who could help me identify new opportunities or put me in touch with relevant people in the sports industry and research and development sector.

However, one of the main differences this week was that I sent many more direct applications and messages through LinkedIn. I used the platform to identify companies and professionals whose activities match my academic background and career goals, particularly in sports equipment, product development, sports performance, and R&D. This approach allowed me to broaden my search and reach out to new contacts directly rather than relying exclusively on traditional applications.

Another important part of my work this week was personalizing all my cover letters. Instead of sending the same letter to every company, I adapted each one to the organization and the type of position targeted. I focused on presenting my academic skills, my experience at Decathlon, and the knowledge I am developing during my Master's degree in Sport, Health and Artificial Intelligence. My aim was to demonstrate how my background could be useful to each company's projects and activities.

Finally, I followed up with several companies I had already contacted, including Decathlon, to reiterate my interest and try to obtain feedback on my applications. Although finding a suitable internship remains challenging, I am continuing to diversify my approach by combining direct applications, LinkedIn networking, personal contacts, and follow-up messages. My priority is to keep expanding my search and increase my chances of finding an internship that matches my interests and professional objectives.
