Since the beginning of the year, I have applied to various companies. Initially, I targeted those involved in commercial R&D, such as Decathlon. When applying to Decathlon, I highlighted the skills I had acquired during my bachelor's degree and those gained during my two years of full-time employment there as a technician. I was also able to include the skills I would be acquiring during my first year of the master's program (M1). I also applied to Aquaman; I received two responses there—first, notification that my CV had been forwarded (though without much hope of success), and second, advice on my CV from the woman who contacted me, which allowed me to make revisions.

Beyond that, I applied to a large number of similar companies. However, most of the time I received no response, or occasionally a polite rejection. More recently, I turned to sports clubs—both professional and high-level amateur—seeking roles as a data analyst. Yet, I met with only a few rejections and a great many non-responses. These applications covered the whole of France, ranging from Montpellier to my hometown of Marseille and locations across the country. Moving forward, I am continuing to search for clubs as well as companies I might have overlooked in my numerous previous applications. All the recorded responses were the same: they are not looking for interns for this position.
